ANYBODY SEEN LILLITH?

I'm guessing you didn't know this. There is a company at 312 Crescent Court that develops and presents plays that re-examine history through women's perspectives. It's called Looking For Lillith Theatre Company, the reference being to a mythical strong, independent woman named Lillith.

It presents good plays, such as Fabric, Flames and Fervor: Girls of the Triangle, about the 1911 New York City Triangle Shirtwaist Factory fire.

The company was founded in New York in 2001 by Louisville natives Shannon Wooley and Trina Fischer, with Jennifer Thalman Kepler of Fairfax, Va.. It's based in Crescent Hill now, but has participants in the Washington area, and Oakland, Ca.

In July, it will offer two four-day drama camps for children from three and a half to 14 years old, in Old Louisville. While the children learn about drama, they'll also learn about community and self esteem. For information: <http://www.lookingforlillith.org>

Former CHCC President Jason Baker got a nice writeup in a recent issue of Business First, for starting his own company, Flexible Pharmacy Services, so he could spend more time with his young family.

"I want to be at home to see my kids grow," he told BF's Ed Green.

You go, Jason.
